How does the concept of anthropomorphism help us better understand and relate to God, and what are some potential pitfalls of this approach?

In what ways might modern Christians be unintentionally 'marrying themselves to the world,' and how can we guard against this tendency?

How can we discern between God's value system and our own or the world's value system in making important life decisions?

What does it mean to 'walk with God' like Noah did, and how can we cultivate that kind of relationship in our daily lives?

How might the story of Noah and the flood challenge our understanding of God's judgment and mercy?

In what ways might churches today be adopting 'business practices' or worldly methods that compromise their spiritual integrity?

How can Christians maintain a distinct identity in an increasingly secular culture without becoming judgmental or isolationist?

What does it mean to have 'instant obedience' to God, and how can we cultivate this attitude in our spiritual lives?

How does understanding the 'effects of sin' impact our view of human nature and our need for redemption?

In what ways might God be 'shortening our years' or putting 'proper fear' in our lives to protect us from corruption, as He did after the flood?
